Excerpt from Construction and Operation of a Compact Fine-Wire Psychrometer The principal difficulty encountered in using unaspirated psychrometric instruments is the need for providing an optimum quantity of water to the wet element while allowing for maximum evaporative cooling of the sensor. In addition, the evaporation process and the resultant cooling of the air immediately adjacent to the wet element must not influence the response of the dry element. During measurements, it is assumed: that a steady state of relative humidity exists, that the heat required to vaporize water from the wet element is supplied by the air flowing over the sensor, and that the rate of evaporation is a function of the vapor pressure gradient between the sensor and the air. Therefore, for an unaspirated wet sensor to achieve maximum cooling for any given vapor pressure deficit, convective heat transfer must be sufficient to maintain the vapor pressure gradient, hence, maximum evaporation. These criteria can be met by using sufficiently small sensing elements wherein convective heat loss increases with a decrease in element size. A second advantage of very small elements...
